YOUR CREATIVE STRATEGY PROFILE

A-

LEVEL 4 OF 4

The Strategist.

You already think like a strategist. You research, hypothesize, brief, test, iterate. The system works. Now it's time people see it.

WHERE YOU ARE

02

You think in systems. That's rare in this field.

Your answers were precise. You sequenced your thinking. You considered second-order effects. When a hypothesis failed, you didn't panic, you checked the variables and formed the next one. Most people skip all of that.

THE REAL PROBLEM

You're already doing strategy-level work. The gap isn't in your skill set. It's in who knows about it. Does anyone outside your current client list have any idea what you actually do?

Where value is slipping through

- You still call yourself a copywriter in some rooms
- Your LinkedIn says "freelance creative" instead of "creative strategist"
- Your proposals open with writing samples, not strategic thinking
- Your case studies show what you wrote, not what you decided
- Your process has no name, so clients can't buy into it

WHAT THIS MEANS

03

Your bottleneck isn't skill. It's how you're seen.

WHAT THE MARKET SEES	WHAT YOU ACTUALLY DID
"They wrote a good ad."	"Researched the audience across 3 sources. Found the belief shift competitors missed. Built the hypothesis. Wrote the brief. Ran the test. Iterated."

If you don't name that process, you get paid for the ad. If you do, you get paid for the thinking behind it.

What creative strategy is made of.

These 5 skills separate people who write from people who think. Here's where you stand on each one.

Dialed in

1. Research

You pull VOC data from multiple sources and organize what you find. Your research feeds your creative decisions, it's not decoration, it's the foundation.

Dialed in

2. Data Analysis

You read the full story in the numbers. You isolate variables, check for confounding factors, and pull funnel-level insights, not just ad-level ones.

Dialed in

3. Creative Briefing

Your briefs are strategic documents: insight, hypothesis, hook direction, test variable. There's room to standardize the format, but the thinking is there.

Dialed in

4. Hypothesis Thinking

You think in testable terms. When something fails, you update the model and form the next hypothesis. This is your sharpest edge.

Dialed in

5. Iteration

You know the difference between angle rotation and creative rotation. You know when to iterate and when to start fresh. A documented playbook would make this compound faster.

Make the work visible.

TOP OF THE SPECTRUM

You don't need to get better. You need to get seen.

01

Rewrite your positioning

Drop "copywriter" from your bio. Lead with what you do: "I research audiences, form creative hypotheses, and build testing frameworks that scale ad performance."

+ Opens the door to visibility

02

Publish your thinking

Write one case study that shows your decisions, not your deliverables. Research to hypothesis to brief to result. Show the thinking. That's what commands $150+/hour.

+ Builds authority

03

Name your process

Give your system a name. Frame it as a 5-step method. Put it in proposals, on LinkedIn, in conversations. Named processes feel proprietary and clients pay more for them.

+ Creates intellectual property

You scored at the top.
You know your stuff.

So let's skip the part where I explain what creative strategy is. You live it.

Tomorrow, your daily emails start. And because you landed in the Strategist tier, yours are going to look different from what the other tiers get. We're going deeper:

- Positioning: How to reframe the way you talk about yourself so the market sees what you actually do not just the output
- Creative leadership: How to present your process to clients before you show them work, so they see the thinking, not just the ad
- Building IP from your process: Your repeatable method is intellectual property. We'll talk about naming it, documenting it, and making it the thing people hire you for

ONE THING BEFORE WE START

Reply to your first email with the word STRATEGIST and tell me this: if you had to name your creative strategy process and pitch it in one sentence, what would you call it? I read every reply. And yes, I'll tell you if the name sucks.
